WA'TER. n. ſ. [water, Dutch; pœcer, Saxon.]

1. Their ſmoothneſs accounts for their ſliding eaſily over one another's ſurface: their ſphericity keeps them alſo from touching one another in more points than one; and by both theſe their frictions in ſliding over one another, is rendered the leaſt poſſible. Their hardneſs accounts for the incompreſſibility of water, when it is free from the intermixture of air. The poroſity of water is ſo very great, that there is at leaſt forty times as much ſpace as matter in it; for water is nineteen times ſpecifically lighter than gold, and conſequently rarer in the ſame proportion. Quincy.

Will with the wiſp is of a round figure, in bigneſs like the flame of a candle; but ſometimes broader, and like a bundle of twigs ſet on fire. It ſometimes gives a brighter light than that of a wax-candle; at other times more obſcure, and of a purple colour. When viewed near at hand, it ſhines leſs than at a diſtance. They wander about in the air, not far from the ſurface of the earth; and are more frequent in places that are unctuous, mouldy, marſhy, and abounding with reeds. They haunt burying places, places of execution, dunghills. They commonly appear in ſummer, and at the beginning of autumn, and are generally at the height of about ſix feet from the ground. Now they dilate themſelves, and now contract. Now they go on like waves, and rain as it were ſparks of fire; but they burn nothing. They follow thoſe that run away, and fly from thoſe that follow them. Some that have been catched were obſerved to conſiſt of a ſhining, viſcous, and gelatinous matter, like the ſpawn of frogs, not hot or burning, but only ſhining, ſo that the matter ſeems to be phoſphorus, prepared and raiſed from putrified plants or carcaſſes by the heat of the ſun; which is condenſed by the cold of the evening, and then ſhines. Muſch.

If I had had time to have made new liveries, I would have beſtowed the thouſand pound I borrowed of you: but it is no matter, this poor ſhow doth better; this doth infer the zeal I had to ſee him. Shakeſpeare.

O Cromwell, Cromwell!
Had I but ſerv'd my God with half the zeal
I ſerv'd my king, he would not in mine age
Have left me naked to mine enemies. Shakeſpeare.

Among the ſeraphims
Abdiel, than whom none with more zeal ador'd

Good men often blemiſh the reputation of their piety by over-acting ſome things in their religion; by an indiſcreet zeal about things wherein religion is not concerned. Tillotſon.

True zeal ſeems not to be any one ſingle affection of the ſoul; but rather a ſtrong mixture of many holy affections; rather a gracious conſtitution of the whole mind, than any one particular grace, ſwaying a devout heart, and filling it with all pious intentions; all not only uncounterfeit, but moſt fervent. Sprat.

When the ſins of a nation have provoked God to forſake it, he ſuffers thoſe to concur in the moſt pernicious counſels for enſlaving conſcience, who pretend to the greateſt zeal for the liberty of it. Stillingfleet.

The fury of zealots, inteſtine bitterneſs and diviſion were the greateſt occaſion of the laſt fatal deſtruction of Jeruſalem. King Charles.

Are not thoſe men too often the greateſt zealots who are moſt notoriouſly ignorant? True zeal ſhould always begin with true knowledge, and thence proceed to an unwearied paſſion, for what it once knows to be worthy of ſuch paſſion. Sprat.

No wonder that ſo many of theſe deluded zealots have been engaged in a cauſe which they at firſt abhorred, and have wiſhed or acted for the ſucceſs of an enterprize, that might have ended in the extirpation of the proteſtant religion. Addiſon.

ZEA'LOUS. adj. [from zeal.] Ardently paſſionate in any cauſe.

Our hearts are right with God, and our intentions pious, if we act our temporal affairs with a deſire no greater than our neceſſity, and in actions of religion we be zealous, active, and operative, ſo far as prudence will permit. Taylor.

This day, at height of noon, came to my ſphere,
A ſpirit, zealous, as he ſeem'd to know
More of the Almighty's works. Milton.

We ſhould be not only devout towards God, but zealous towards men; endeavouring by all prudent means to recover them out of thoſe ſnares of the devil, whereby they are taken captive. Decay of Piety.

It is not at all good to be zealous againſt any perſon, but only againſt their crimes. It is better to be zealous for things than for perſons: but then it ſhould be only for good things; a rule that does certainly exclude all manner of zeal for ill things, all manner of zeal for little things. Sprat.

Being inſtructed only in the general, and zealous in the main deſign; and as finite beings, not admitted into the ſecrets of government, the laſt reſorts of providence, or capable of diſcovering the final purpoſes of God, they muſt be ſometimes ignorant of the means conducing to thoſe ends in which alone they can oppoſe each other. Dryden.

ZEA'LOUSLY. adv. [from zealous.] With paſſionate ardour.

True love is ſtill the ſame: the torrid zones,
And thoſe more frigid ones,
It muſt not know:
For love grown cold or hot,
Is luſt or friendſhip, not
The thing we ſhow;
For that's a flame would die,
Held down or up too high:
Then think I love more than I can expreſs,
And would love more, could I but love thee leſs. Suckling.

The ſun, with rays directly darting down,
Fires all beneath, and fries the middle zone. Dryden.
